The rising rates of interest charged on the emergency circulation tend to prevent its use until there is a strip gency and money rates are above the normal. Therefore there must be some skepticism about the practical value of the temporary measure offered, and which was rushed through Congress by Aldrich and Vreeland in the hope that before it should lapse the Cen-tral Reserve Association would become a law. This stringency the Sec-retary intended to prevent by an-nouncing his readiness to aid in providing the crop-moving funds by en-abling the banks to enlarge their circulation at the season when the largest
